Advent

“Love is the source and goal, faith is the slow process of getting there, and hope is the willingness to move forward without resolution and closure.”

– Richard Rohr

Advent is here again, and again we find ourselves in the not yet/already pregnancy of time... the waiting, longing, pondering, searching, hoping, yearning space of wondering if love will ever fix the bind we're in.

I don't know about you, but waiting can really suck. Seasons like this one highlight the both/and nature of waiting. Recognizing we're not where we want to be, admitting we feel like we've barely made sense of the journey so far, and straining to believe the journey, in the end will be worth it.

And, waiting can really be precisely what we need. Longing for resolution and closure is certainly a piece of the human condition – but life never offers it to us. So then: advent becomes the training ground for love, faith and hope.

The confirmation for remembering the journey is the destination. The measurement by which we slow down long enough to marrow in the tension the slow process of getting there.

Friends: I urge you — get comfortable with the uncomfortable. Embrace the not yet. Welcome the yearning. Make friends with the impossibility of never arriving, always being there. This is advent’s invitation. Let’s turn our attention again to the narrative of the holy family’s journey to Jesus birth – the symbolism and representation of Mary and Joseph and all the cast of characters who pondered and wondered and longed for love’s arrival.

Waiting with you,
Pastor Libby

Join The Table in the Red Clay Abbey’s presentation of “All Creation Waits: The Advent Mystery of New Beginnings.” We will gather on Wednesday evenings around the themes of advent, and you can also choose to join in daily reflections from our very own Abbess, Ani Wa, Jessika. And if you need a little extra room to grieve, lament and wallow in the stretch of the not yet/already — join us on Wednesday the 21st for the longest night of the year gathering with our partner congregation: Shepherd of the Hills Presbyterian. The Table, Red Clay Abbey will be co-presenting that night.
